Mr. Moss then delivered his attack.

"We do not need to spend $161.000,001 becase people want to bring water from the Catskills," he said. "Neither do we want a foolish scheme like this to install a meter in every house. These hydrants, some of which have been in use fifty years or more.

"Watch the engines at work at any fire and see how the pumping shakes the hydrants until the pipes beneath are made full of holes that are never looked after. Take the thousands of oold houses that have been torn down. You will invariably find that the pipes are left to lie there, an ordinary biuss plug having been driven in by a hammer to stop the leak. Afterward that decaps as well as the pipes, and a constant leak is the result."
